Interventions

Interventions are guest-edited collections of short essays that put forward insightful, thought-provoking, and well-grounded arguments about a timely theme. Interventions may reflect critically on current theorization, steer readers’ attention toward new concepts and ideas, and/or alert readers to gaps in empirical research. Individual contributions may, or may not, agree with one another. The theme and content must be relevant to political geography and related fields. Contributions are not mini-research articles. Contributors must engage with current debates and themes and must offer new insights that challenge existing perspectives and conceptualizations. Guest editors are responsible for guiding contributors and ensuring the collection works as one, cohesive entity.

The collection must include an introduction written by the guest editor(s), 3–5 author contributions (typically 1500-2000 words each), and a shared bibliography. The entire collection must not exceed 11,000 words, inclusive of everything. Each contribution has its own title, but we discourage the use of subheadings within individual contributions. While not peer-reviewed, Interventions are reviewed by the Setting the Agenda editor and possibly by other members of the editorial team. Questions and proposals should be submitted directly to the Setting the Agenda editor, Caroline Nagel: cnagel@mailbox.sc.edu.
