

Call for Papers

The recent financial crisis in the western world, triggered by an insolvent banking system in the United States, has led not only to the collapse of large financial institutions but also to massive bailouts of banks by governments and to significant downturns in stock markets throughout the world. These momentous events collectively call for innovative new research that will shed valuable light on topics such as financial intermediation and capital markets, the relationship between law and finance, the integration of regional and global financial markets, corporate financial policy, and behavioral finance. Under new editorial leadership, the focus of the North American Journal of Economics and Finance is precisely on these and other related areas of research in financial economics.

The new editorial team is actively soliciting high quality submissions in financial economics and this team is committed to a review process that is both constructive and timely in nature.

The North-American Journal of Economics and Finance publishes high quality original manuscripts in financial economics. Areas of interest include, but not limited to financial intermediation and capital markets, law and finance, asset pricing, global and regional integration of financial markets, capital and security markets, corporate governance, information and security markets, behavioral finance, corporate financial policy and financial econometrics. The journal makes extra efforts toward maintaining a balance between theoretical and empirical work, and aims to provide prompt and constructive reviews to author(s). Empirical analysis should be capable of replication. Authors of accepted papers will be encouraged to supply data and computer programs.

To find out more, to subscribe or to submit your paper please visit www.elsevier.com/locate/najef.
